Rocky Sand Studio: Google branding across a 21-app portfolio.

Rocky Sand Studio repeats the same Google-led sales presentation across Docs+, Mail+ and Cal+, three paid third-party Mac clients. Google's recognizable wordmarks and product branding dominate the promotions while the actual supplier is a separate company. We assess this repeated presentation as misleading brand exploitation: users can mistake the familiar Google identity for the identity of the app's provider. The 21-app audit documents the original artwork, paid-feature complaint, EU trader disclosures and the separate GM IApps download trail. The publisher-linked X account is identified as based in Hungary in the supplied platform capture; this is a qualified country association, with the company's registered jurisdiction unconfirmed.

WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW

A repeated pattern of misleading Google-led marketing across three paid clients.

01

Docs+, Mail+ and Cal+ place Google branding in the sales pitch

Docs+ reproduces Google's multicolour wordmark outside the document interface, below a smaller Docs+ for label. Mail+ and Cal+ use the same brand-led presentation. These are third-party Rocky Sand products, with explicit non-affiliation disclaimers in their descriptions. The disclaimer does not establish permission to use the branding.

All 21 identified apps were checked visually

The audit covers 21 seller-matched app icons, all 69 original Apple promotions and the current listing text. Easy Streaming shows eight service logos; FreeChat references WhatsApp. Three utilities make Apple-feature claims. The remaining 13 did not produce a concrete brand-imitation finding in this review.

A real link into the Graure investigation

GM IApps advertises Mail Plus for Gmail and sends its download button to Rocky Sand Studio's Mail+ page. That destination then links to app 1216244845. The link connects the public marketing trails, but does not establish who controls either company or developer account.

Paid-feature dissatisfaction is documented

A two-star Mail+ review dated 6 August 2025 reports a one-time purchase followed by unreliable account/window switching and limited font controls. The reviewer describes disappointing functionality; the review alone does not establish fraudulent billing or a fake Gmail connection.

A repeated marketing practice by the same developer

The same seller uses recognizable Google branding across three separately monetized products: Docs+, Mail+ and Cal+. In each case, the sales artwork foregrounds a Google product identity. This repetition supports a developer-level finding about the marketing practice, rather than an isolated design oversight.

Our editorial assessment is that this presentation is misleading brand exploitation. It borrows the recognition and trust attached to Google while selling access through independently supplied Mac software. The concern is concrete: a buyer browsing the App Store sees Google's visual identity before receiving a comparably clear explanation of who supplies the paid client.

A clear presentation would make Rocky Sand Studio's identity prominent and describe the Google compatibility accurately. The non-affiliation sentences elsewhere in the descriptions are preserved, but they do not change what the promotional images display or establish permission to use Google branding.

The broader portfolio and company claims provide context: 21 current apps were verified, and the publisher advertises substantial download reach. These are reasons to scrutinize a repeated commercial presentation. Each app's actual functionality, customer complaints and other brand uses are assessed individually in the audit below.

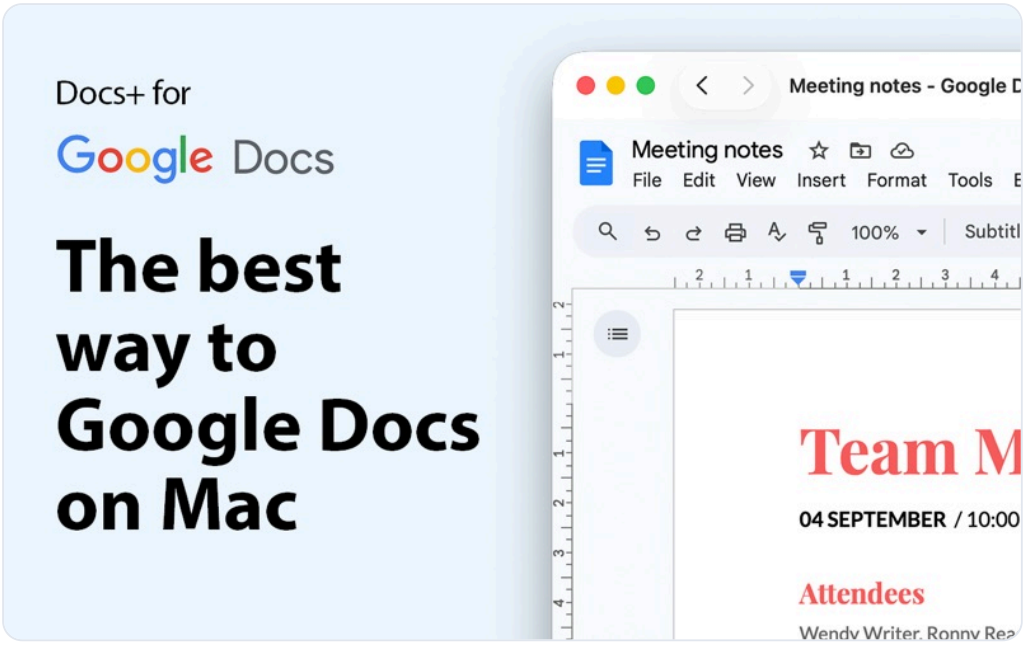

Sources: E3, E4, E45; original Mail+, Cal+ and Docs+ Apple promotions. E47–E48: Google's visual/compatibility guidance. E51: complete current account catalog. Editorial assessment based on the displayed evidence, checked 5 November 2026.

Docs+: Google's logo is part of the sales artwork

The first Docs+ promotion reproduces the multicolour Google wordmark next to Docs, outside the document window, below the smaller Docs+ for label. Inside the adjacent Google document screenshot, the blue Docs product icon appears again. This separates two different uses: the branded advertisement headline and the depiction of the supported service's interface.

Google's compatibility guidance allows relevant plain-text references and illustrative product screenshots. Its visual guidance requires the publisher's own identity to remain clear. Prominent Google corporate branding in a third-party sales identity warrants closer scrutiny than a Docs icon naturally visible inside the service UI.

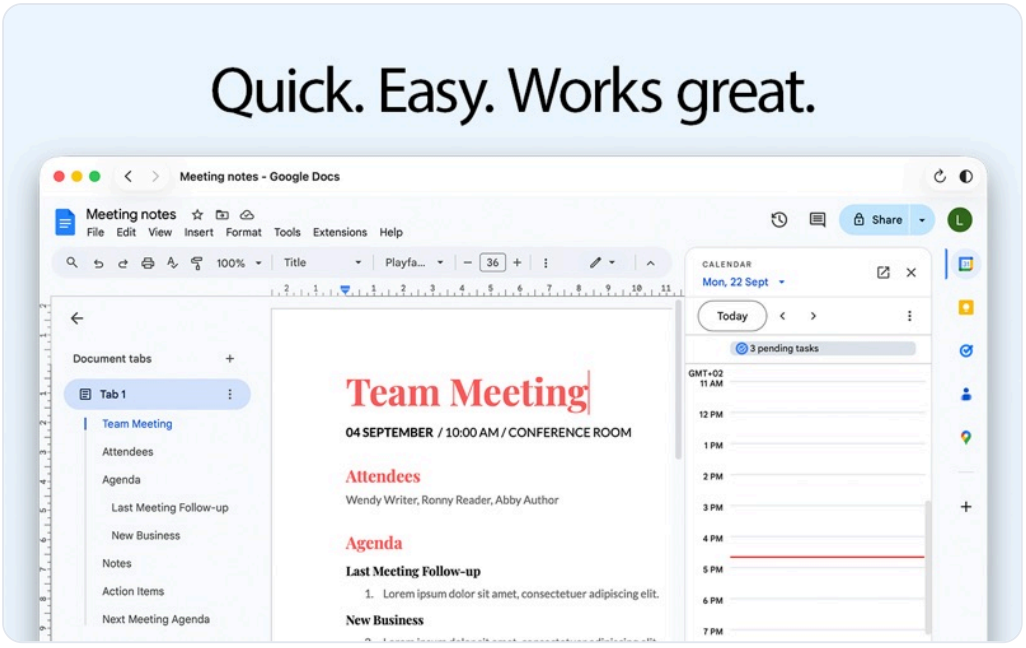

The description calls Docs+ a third-party application and disclaims production, endorsement or affiliation by Google. That statement matters, but it is not evidence that Google licensed the commercial branding. The documented concern is an apparent branding-policy conflict and risk of mistaken affiliation; no permission record or legal infringement decision was established.

Easy Streaming: eight recognizable service logos

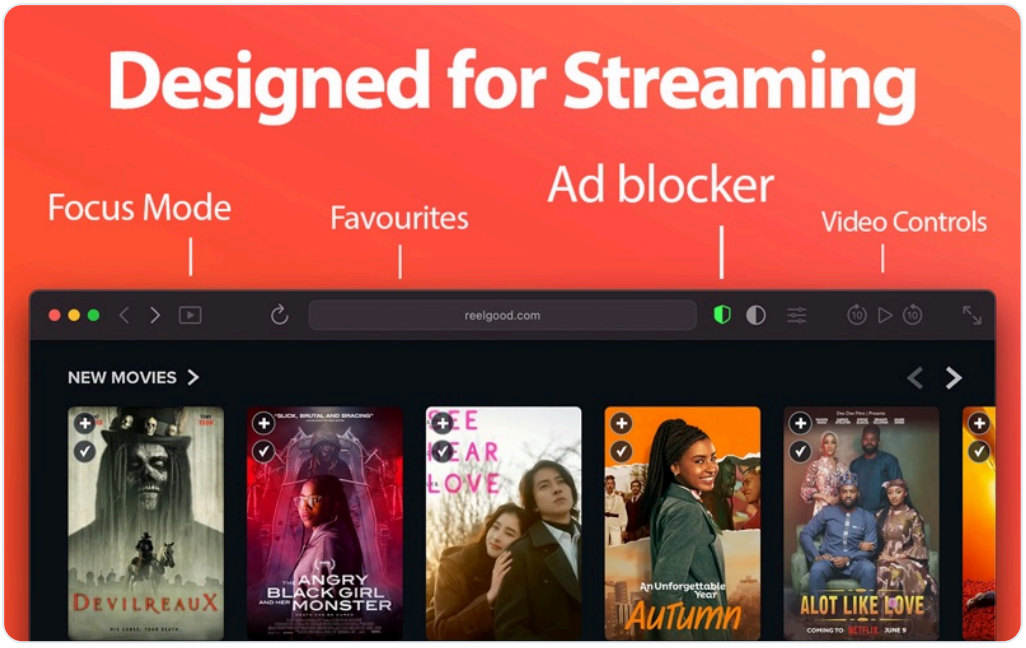

The first Easy Streaming promotion shows YouTube, Netflix, Prime Video, Disney+, Max, Hulu, Twitch and Showtime logos as favourites tiles inside the advertised browser. A second promotion advertises an ad blocker alongside the video interface. Its subtitle also names YouTube and Netflix.

This is a distinct authorization question, not an identical app-icon finding: the app's own icon is a red-orange screen/play symbol. The description calls it a third-party video browser and disclaims association with the streaming services. A grid of service shortcuts can describe browser compatibility; its presence does not establish that every logo use is unlawful.

Apple's third-party-service rule requires permission under the relevant service terms when an app accesses, displays or monetizes a service. The public material reviewed does not establish the developer's agreements. No playback, DRM circumvention, illegal downloading or effectiveness of ad blocking was tested.

Apple-feature claims: visible, but not proven false

Memory Diag's promotion says it was featured in Get Stuff Done and Invaluable Utilities and explicitly labels the Mac App Store, 2015. Battery Monitor similarly shows Apple-feature badges; Leaf states an Apple editorial-feature claim in its description. These are publisher-authored promotional statements, not a current endorsement independently confirmed by this investigation.

No historical Apple editorial capture was recovered to independently resolve the claims. The audit therefore records them as verification leads, rather than labelling them fabricated. A screenshot of the ordinary macOS Dock or Finder menu in another utility is also insufficient, by itself, to establish false Apple affiliation.

Battery Monitor original promotion: publisher-displayed Apple-feature badges.

Sources: E31, E32, E28, E50. Checked 5 November 2026.

The promotion claims eight million downloads

The original Mail+ sales image advertises more than 8 million downloads and more than 80,000 ratings worldwide. These are the publisher's marketing figures, not independently verified download counts. The image does not explain the measurement date, counting method or whether the totals cover this app, earlier releases or a wider product family.

The company homepage separately configures counters for 45 million downloads and 900,000 daily users. Those company-wide claims cannot be treated as audited reach for Mail+ or Cal+. They do, however, show that the seller markets itself as a substantial software publisher.

In the Mail+ promotion, the official Gmail symbol and Gmail wordmark are much larger than the accompanying Mail+ for wording. Cal+ uses a similar presentation around Google Calendar branding. This is the strongest visual reason for a consumer-affiliation warning: the brand that attracts the buyer is Google, while the paid product is supplied by Rocky Sand Studio. The full descriptions and product pages preserve the express Google non-affiliation disclaimer.

Sources: E3, E4, E10; original Apple promotion images and publisher homepage HTML, checked 5 November 2026.

Cal+ and Google Calendar: shared colours, different icons

Cal+ wraps a white calendar grid in a rounded blue, green, yellow and red frame. The official Google Calendar reference uses a blue page with the number 31. The palette and calendar theme overlap, but the shapes, internal details and date treatment differ. This comparison does not support calling the files identical.

The stronger affiliation concern is the combination of Google product names, prominent product branding in the promotions and a paid third-party product. The disclosures stating that Google does not produce or endorse it are relevant and preserved.

The GM IApps → Rocky Sand Studio trail

A page on gmiapps.com describes Mail Plus for Gmail as an available product and sends visitors to rockysandstudio.com/mail-plus.html. The destination names Rocky Sand Studio and links to the exact Mail+ App Store ID examined here. This is a direct, reproducible web link.

The earlier Graure report connects GM IApps to the earlier Mihai Graure portfolio through an indexed publisher link and a matching app-specific support contact. That background makes the new outbound product link worth examining. It does not make Rocky Sand Studio a proven part of the Graure operation.

There are also product-detail differences: GM IApps states macOS 13 or later and emphasizes keyboard-first account switching; Apple lists macOS 12 for Mail+. The buyer review describes account-switching limitations. These are differences in published claims, not a verified test of the app or proof that either website was authorized by the other.

What the paying customer actually reported

The 6 August 2025 two-star review describes buying the one-time option, then encountering poor account switching, duplicate window spaces and limited font scaling. This is a concrete paid-feature complaint. The reviewer also says they intend to keep trying the app and hope for improvements.

Apple also displays favourable reviews. They matter: the evidence is mixed, and the selected dissatisfied buyer is not proof that every customer was misled. No payment, subscription cancellation, account login or app functionality was tested in this investigation.

Hungary: the publisher's X account location

Apple consistently names Rocky Sand Studio Ltd. as seller and developer under account 457404255. The publisher operates a dedicated website, product pages, a support centre and a privacy policy. Its exact-ID portfolio includes long-running utilities, not only brand-named clients.

The X screenshots supplied by the reporter identify @RockySandStudio, link back to rockysandstudio.com and display Account based in Hungary. The publisher's own website links the same X handle. This provides a direct identity chain from the Apple seller's linked site to the account whose platform location is Hungary.

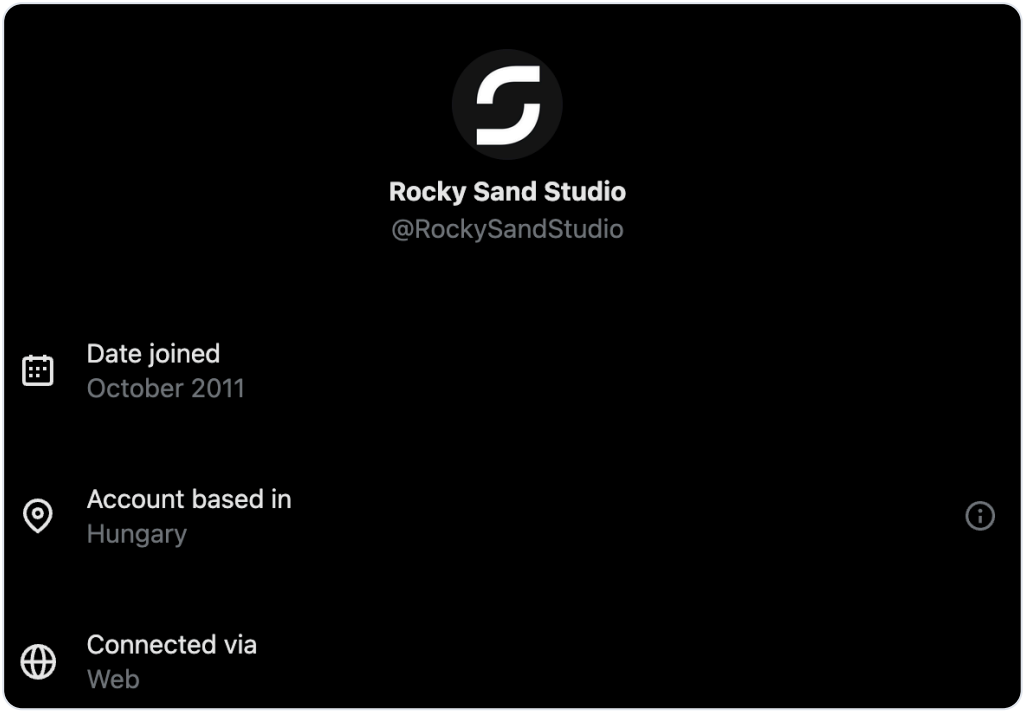

X says the About this Account country or region is inferred from aggregated IP addresses. It is distinct from a self-entered profile location. This supports a qualified association with the account's operating location; it does not certify a legal registered office, incorporation jurisdiction, nationality, beneficial ownership or the location of every person managing the account.

For country classification in this report and Statistics, Mail+, Cal+ and Docs+ are associated with Hungary on that explicitly labelled basis. The platform label was read from the supplied captures, rather than an independently refreshed live About page. The company's registered jurisdiction remains unconfirmed.

The earlier Victoria, Seychelles software/company-directory entries remain secondary leads. They concern a possible corporate location and do not resolve the company-registration question. The new Hungarian platform association is recorded separately; neither a US storefront nor website hosting establishes corporate residence.

Reporter-supplied X profile capture, 5 November 2026: @RockySandStudio links to rockysandstudio.com and shows the original app portfolio banner.

Reporter-supplied X About this account capture, 5 November 2026: Account based in Hungary. X describes this as an IP-inferred account location, not a company-registration record.

The complete 21-app visual audit

FreeChat and Docs+: compare the app icons separately

The Docs+ icon is a rainbow-outlined folded document; Google Docs uses a solid blue document. FreeChat uses a green monitor/chat-bubble design; official WhatsApp uses a telephone inside a chat bubble. Those differences are visible and preserved.

The stronger Docs+ concern is the actual Google wordmark in the sales artwork. FreeChat's service name, green presentation and interface are recorded as compatibility/brand-use context, not proof that its app icon is an exact copy.

Paid convenience, account access and disclosure

Mail+ and Cal+ are free to download with paid convenience features. Both list $7.99 yearly and $19.99 one-time purchases in the US; Germany and Ireland show €8.99 yearly and €22.99 one-time. No weekly plan was found. Charging for a third-party client is not itself evidence of deception.

The publisher says the Gmail notifier and Calendar access use Google APIs and require Google-account permissions. Those are published claims, not a security audit. The privacy policy names Google API Limited Use requirements, analytics and Apple payments; Apple declares Contact Info and Usage Data not linked to identity. Website analytics alone does not establish that private Gmail content is collected or sold.

A firm selling multiple paid software products while declaring non-trader status warrants scrutiny of its EU disclosure. Apple displays that declaration for both apps; it is not a verified ruling on whether the company legally qualifies as a trader.

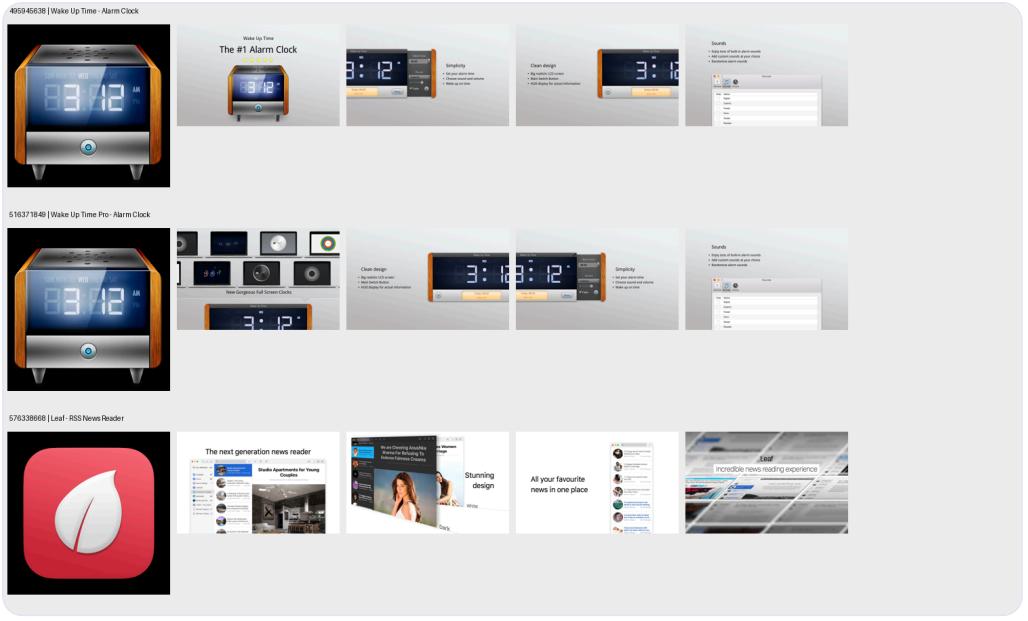

Google's public guidance requires messaging and visual presentation to accurately represent its role and avoid implying endorsement. Apple's review rules address accurate metadata, copycats and intellectual property. The documented presentation can be assessed against those rules, but no permission record, court finding or Apple enforcement decision was established.
